

DECONSTRUCTING GREED

& FEAR OF FAILURE

by

KIM ANN CURTIN

THE WALL STREET COACH

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, transmitted in any form or means, electronic or mechanical, stored in a retrieval system, photocopied, recorded, scanned, or otherwise without proper written permission from the publisher.

All Rights Reserved

Copyright © 2021

Kim Ann Curtin

Disclaimer

All knowledge contained in this book is given for informational and educational purposes only. The author is not responsible for any results or outcomes that result from using this material. Constructive attempts have been made to provide information that is both accurate and effective, but the author is not bound for the accuracy or use/misuse of this information.

Table of Contents

Introduction.....	5
Chapter 1: How Do Fear of Failure and Greed Function in Trading?.....	7
Fear of Failure.....	7
Greed.....	8
Can you Relate?.....	8
Chapter 2: What Lies Beneath: Universal Needs.....	10
Universal Needs.....	10
What Happens When Needs Are Not Met?.....	11
What Does It Have to Do With Trading?.....	12
Put your Emotions on the Shelf.....	13
Chapter 3: How Do You Define Success and Failure?.....	15
Failure and Success: What's Your Definition?.....	15
Chapter 4: Can Curiosity Kill Fear of Failure and Greed?.....	18
Entering the Curiosity Mindset.....	18
Examine Fear of Winning.....	19
What's Your Relationship to Money?.....	20
Chapter 5: Bringing it All Together.....	21
Unmet Needs in Trading.....	22
Filling the Void.....	23
Untangling the Misinformation.....	24
Redefining Success.....	24
Go Forth and Trade Confidently.....	25

Introduction

Fear of failure. Greed.

No matter who you are or what path you've chosen in life, you've probably experienced these two things. They're very human struggles.

Fear of failure and greed can make people do things that they know they should not. They can make people act in ways that are not in their best interest.

In trading, it can lead to poor decision-making, taking foolish risks, and the erosion of both your trading account and mental capital.

This can lead to negative self-talk and reduced self-esteem and self-worth.

But what if fear of failure and greed aren't actually the problems?

Often, fear of failure and greed are symptoms of a deeper underlying issue. They are signs that needs are not being met.

What if you could use them as "clues" to dig deeper and get to the bottom of what is holding you back?

What if, in the long run, fear of failure and greed could actually bring about positive change? What if exploring these things could bring you more in tune with your inner workings and tendencies, giving you better self-understanding, better self-control, and even a greater sense of inner peace?

Fear of failure and greed can feel like monsters that are constantly chasing you.

This book is an invitation to stop running, turn around, and face them.

This is not easy work. It's emotionally challenging. It requires the ability to put your emotions on the shelf and to get curious about what drives you.

It requires the bold act of acknowledging that you have needs and that it's vital to ensure that they are met.

It is a challenging process, but the results can be extraordinary. Are you ready to get curious?

Chapter 1: How Do Fear of Failure and Greed Function in Trading?

When it comes to trading, fear of failure and greed are sort of like an all-you-can-eat buffet for your inner gremlins. They can be debilitating, thwarting any true progress. Let's look at some examples of how they can play out on a daily basis:

Fear of Failure

Say that you're on a winning streak ... You've had a series of profitable trades using a specific strategy. But then, for whatever reason, the market shifts. All of a sudden, your formerly winning strategy has put you in the red.

The market is ever-changing. It can feel like there's no rhyme or reason to it. Often, there are too many factors at play for the average person to really make sense of it.

Despite the fact that the stock market is beyond any one person's control, many traders let fear of failure take over at such times.

Instead of accepting that the market is shifting, maybe you feel an intense need to try to make back the money you've lost right away. You enter trades without thinking them through first. This is called "revenge trading" — and it usually doesn't end well.

Often, it turns into a nasty cycle. You start to make impulsive, emotionally-driven decisions in trades. The losses begin to compound. You begin to doubt yourself. The self-blame kicks in. You call yourself stupid.

It keeps repeating. After a while, you become so debilitated that you have difficulty creating a thesis for a trade and have little to no faith in your trading plans.

Greed

The 'bag-holder' mentality is perhaps the most famous and relatable example of how greed plays out in trading.

Say that you're in a trade. The stock price is going up. It hits your price target, but instead of exiting the trade, you think, 'No, it's going to keep going.' Even though you've exceeded your initial trading plan's goal, you decide to hold on a little bit longer.

But instead of continuing to go up, the stock begins to dip again. It dips below your price target.

That's when you start to rationalize your decision. 'It'll come back,' you tell yourself. It doesn't. The price keeps going down. Before you know it, you're in the red.

Maybe you try to average down, buying yet more shares because you're sure it will turn around.

Or maybe you just keep holding and hoping for the stock to turn around. But that could take days, weeks, months ... even years. Or it might never recover.

All the while, this greed-fueled decision is deteriorating your sense of self worth, stressing you out, and tying up the funds in your account, preventing you from pursuing other trades.

Can You Relate?

Even if these examples have not been your precise experience, most traders can probably think of a time or ten when these struggles have played a role in their trading.

It's one thing to be able to relate to these experiences and recognize that fear of failure and greed can (and probably do) affect your trading.

But identifying them is only a piece of the puzzle.

The real question is much bigger and harder to answer: How can I overcome fear of failure and greed?

First, some good news: fear of failure and greed do not preclude you from becoming a steady trader.

However, it is important to begin unpacking what's behind them.

Often, the concept of fear of failure and greed isn't about identifying them as such, but diving deeper into what's behind it.

Unpacking a fear of failure OR a fear of success all starts with curiosity and understanding what is behind it all...

Chapter 2: What Lies Beneath:

Universal Needs

Fear of failure and greed are both huge downers.

Fear of failure can shrink your world and your ability to see opportunities.

Greed — which is the word that so many traders use to describe the insatiable sensation that comes with staying in a trade too long — can make you feel weak-willed and as if you have no self-control.

But what if these two feelings — the constriction that comes with fear of failure, and the intense hunger that comes with greed — actually have nothing to do with money at all? What if they're just clues, leading you to much bigger things?

This may sound shocking...

Fear of failure and greed probably aren't the issues that are holding you back as a trader. It's probably what's behind them that is keeping you from realizing your true potential.

Universal Needs

Fear and failure and greed are not inherent flaws. Usually, they're just symptoms of unmet needs.

To understand the concept of needs, let's start with few major ones that few people would argue:

- Air
- Food
- Water
- Shelter

These are some of the most primal and basic human needs — you'd die without them. But to say that these are the only human needs would be oversimplifying the beautiful experience that is life. Here's a more comprehensive list of human needs that are vital to happiness and well-being:

BASIC UNIVERSAL NEEDS

CONNECTION

acceptance affection appreciation belonging cooperation communication closeness community companionship compassion consideration consistency empathy inclusion intimacy
love
mutuality nurturing respect/self-respect
safety
security stability support to know and be known to see and be seen
to understand and be understood trust warmth

PHYSICAL WELL-BEING

air
food
movement/exercise
rest/sleep
sexual expression
safety
shelter
touch
water

HONESTY

authenticity
integrity presence

PLAY

joy
humor

PEACE

beauty
communion ease equality harmony inspiration order

MEANING

awareness
celebration of life
challenge
clarity competence consciousness contribution creativity
discovery efficacy effectiveness growth
hope learning
mourning participation purpose
self-expression
stimulation
to matter understanding

AUTONOMY

choice
freedom independence space
spontaneity

What Happens When Needs Are Not Met?

When your needs are not being met, you may feel a variety of things — anger, apathy, confusion, depression, embarrassment, nervousness, paralysis ... The list goes on and on. You may experience some of these feelings, all of those feelings, or completely different feelings. You may experience many of them at the same time.

Everyone will react differently to their needs not being met. But no matter what your reaction is, it probably won't feel good. If your basic needs are not being met, negative feelings are inevitable.

When you are deprived of your needs, it is like being deprived of oxygen. You can't survive, much less thrive.

Your survival instincts will kick in — and the results may not be pretty.

Did you know that when someone is drowning, ideally they are approached by two lifeguards?

That's because the drowning person will be desperate for oxygen. So desperate, in fact, that they'll do anything to survive — even push the person saving them into the water to lift themselves up to the surface. That doesn't make them a sociopath or selfish. They are just in survival mode. That's why lifeguards approach in twos.

So if needs are like oxygen ... How will you react when they are not being met? What kinds of destructive or self-destructive behaviors might come out?

This is where Pandora's Box begins to open...

Simply understanding the importance of needs isn't enough to address the problem.

Getting your needs met requires identifying and recognizing what your needs are.

What Does It Have to Do With Trading?

Consider the insatiable feeling that many traders call greed.

If you're attempting to trade and ignoring your unmet needs, greed can be the manifestation of a need not being met.

If it's connected to a need that is not being met, then it truly is like you have a bottomless pit inside of you. It requires so much of you to just keep functioning without that need being met.

If your needs are not being met, it's like asking someone to be an Olympian athlete without proper nutrition or practice. It's simply not possible.

But it is possible to bring yourself to a healthier space. That starts with getting in touch with what those unmet needs are.

When you go deeper, you may find that it's not actually greed at all. It could just be needs clamoring for your attention.

Maybe you have an unmet need for community — that might cause you to stay in trades too long, because you don't want the camaraderie or the feeling of belonging to end.

Maybe your unmet need is security. That could cause you to overstay your welcome in trades, because you think that staying longer will create a sense of long-term stability.

Or maybe your unmet need is adventure. Or challenge. Or discovery. Or participation.

Maybe it's more than one of these things, or another unmet need entirely.

The point is to really get curious about what is driving that greed — or fear of failure.

If you're being driven by something that is costing you a lot, see if you can take a few steps back and see what need might be driving that sense of insatiability.

Many people think they're just in a trade to try to make money. But if you can get a little deeper and examine it without judgment, you may discover a lot more.

Put your Emotions on the Shelf

Here's an example of a healthy decision made by someone who was able to identify his needs and recognize the importance of having them met.

Shane Dorian is a big wave surfer — as well as an accomplished trader. I've had the pleasure of interviewing him on a few occasions.

He once told me about how he had traveled a long distance to chase a wave. But when he arrived at his destination, he was feeling poorly. He had jet lag. He hadn't gotten enough sleep.

So he did something that some people would think was insane — he skipped the wave of the century.

Was it a mistake? Absolutely not.

Sure, there was a sense of regret. But he knew he wasn't in the shape necessary to catch that kind of wave.

If he'd bitten the bullet and taken the wave anyway, he could have died. Literally.

How could you take a piece of that mentality into trading?

If you see the trade of the century come along and you're fighting FOMO, can you have the wherewithal to say no?

If you'd just had a fight with your significant other, if you'd been up all night with a screaming baby, if you hadn't eaten in 48 hours ... Would you be willing to admit you wouldn't be able to think clearly and walk away from the trade?

Ask yourself: Am I really prepared for this big wave?

Having the wherewithal to walk away is not an act of cowardice. It's an act of self preservation, self-love, and self-care. And it could save you from a big calamity.

Chapter 3: How Do You Define Success and Failure?

Fear of failure can be a tricky thing to address, because it has all sorts of sneaky ways of showing up.

If you're bumping into the issue of fear of failure but what we've talked about so far doesn't fully fit, it's possible that you may need to consider the other side of the coin.

For many, it's less about fear of failure, and more about fear of success.

It's possible that there's a long-lasting story that could date back to as early as your childhood or family of origin.

Have you ever found yourself in a place where you had success, but felt like it wasn't enough?

Do you feel as though you're a failure or not enough unless XYZ happens?

Do you feel like the end goal keeps changing — that at one point you feel as if you reach a milestone, it will finally be enough ... Only to find it leaves you feeling empty?

It's uncharted territory for many people, so navigating it can be tough. To begin wading through these murky waters, it can be helpful to begin by defining what success and what failure means to you.

Failure and Success: What's Your Definition?

Everyone has a definition of failure and success. Even if you don't consciously realize what they are, they are running like a ticker tape in the backdrop of your life.

Defining them can help you better navigate them and how they are affecting you.

Not sure where to get started? Grab a notebook and a pen and start writing. Maybe at first you just free write words or phrases that you associate with success or failure.

For instance, success might look like...

A certain amount of money in the bank.
A specific level of success in trading.
Having a house or a vacation home.

Failure might look like...

Losing your job or house.
Not being able to support your family.
Being embarrassed because you made a “stupid” trade.

This exercise might seem stilted or difficult at first. Give yourself time. Sometimes, you may need to filter through ideas that come to the surface and really feel if they are authentic to you. Don't worry about sounding silly.

For instance, I once worked with a woman who was very successful and accomplished. She had a distinct worst-case scenario of failure. She feared becoming a bag lady in New York City. For her, this was a conscious and large-looming fear.

From an outsider's standpoint, this fear seemed unlikely to come to reality. However, it was actively holding her back. It gave her a serious fear of losing her job. It kept her from standing up for herself in her company.

Despite the fact that she was very aware of what failure meant to her, she never actually said it out loud. Admitting it made it real — and the potential of that reality was too frightening to seriously contemplate.

On the one hand, it's not all bad to have these fears. It can help you take proactive steps to protect yourself.

However, it can swing too far. If you don't do the work to get comfortable with failure, you're guaranteed to keep acting in ways that are motivated by fear.

What if the woman in the example I gave you was able to admit to her biggest fear and let it coexist with her success?

What if fear became a more natural part of life — like the air that you breathe in?

This is not asking you to become nihilistic or to attempt to completely stop fearing failure.

The invitation is to accept failure and fear as part of the process of life. This can create a subtle shift. Instead of letting it chase you and feeling like you need to stay a few steps ahead, it's stopping in your tracks, turning around, and looking at what is chasing you.

Part of this is getting comfortable or recognizing your self-talk or inner saboteur. When you make even the smallest mistake, what kind of self-talk follows?

From there, ratchet it up. You forgot to put a stop on a trade, or you made the wrong call and lost money. What do you say to yourself?

Don't avoid these uncomfortable feelings. Try to accept them as part of the process.

Chapter 4: Can Curiosity Kill Fear of Failure and Greed?

If you have a sincere desire to get to the bottom of what feeds fear of failure and greed in your life and trading, this is the most important word in your journey...

Curiosity.

We are all so good at finding what we do wrong...
At being judgmental...
At doubting ourselves.

But most of us don't get curious enough.

Because of our conditioning, it may take some effort to seriously shift into a mindset of genuine curiosity without judgment.

When a failure occurs, the immediate reaction is often self-blame, name-calling, depression. But here's an alternative...

Entering the Curiosity Mindset

Think about a recent failure — whether it was small, medium, or extra-large.

Think back to how you reacted. Consider the following:

What was your self-talk afterward? What did you tell yourself about the experience, and how long did the self-talk last?

How did you feel physically? Did you feel sick to your stomach or nauseous? Did your jaw muscles tighten?

That second part is challenging for many people. It might require some quiet time and meditation. Try to take the elevator down from your head to your inner body to be in tune with the concept of how failure affected you physically.

To expand the exercise, try asking yourself the same questions about a recent success. How was the self-talk different? How were the bodily sensations different?

Examine Fear of Winning

To continue the exercise, begin to look at your fears around not just failure, but success.

As they say, every action has an equal and opposite reaction. There are two sides to the fear of failure. There's a fear of winning too. Sometimes, it can flip from one to the other with little effort, making things more confusing.

Here's a personal story to illustrate.

I was raised by a single mom. I had a wealthy dad who I saw on occasion. It created a sort of dual life. On the one hand, there was my mom, putting $5 of gas in the car at a time, or buying single rolls of toilet paper.

Then, on the weekend, I was going to Tiffany & Co. or to Broadway shows with my dad.

At school, I had a free lunch card ... But thanks to my dad, I also had the dream pants of the era: Calvin Klein jeans.

Even in my youth, I understood the challenge of this dual existence. I understood that it was not appropriate to wear those high-ticket jeans on the day I used my free lunch card.

Success and failure can coexist. While your story may be very different from mine, we all have stories of events that have affected our view of success and failure. There may be instances where they coexisted, or where success was tinged with shame.

Where do these paradoxes live within you? Get curious. Attempt to pull them out. Put them out on the table.

It's not easy, but it can be a powerful practice. These experiences may be the strings on the puppeteer that is holding you back from attaining success today.

What's Your Relationship to Money?

Fear of failure. Fear of success. Greed. They all have something in common: they're all in a long-term relationship with money.

Money is a loaded topic. Consider the average cocktail party ... The hardest conversation topic isn't sex or politics. It's money.

Even the most open people will clam up when it comes to talking about money.

I'm not saying you need to start being totally out there with all of your account balances. But it may be worth taking the time to get curious about your own relationship to money and what it means to you.

Books can be a powerful resource to help you unpack this complicated relationship.

To start, I suggest a simple, no-cost online assessment on Moneyharmony.com. On that site, for the "price" of entering your email, you can take a quiz that helps you determine your money type. Are you a hoarder, a spender, an avoider? Knowing your tendencies can help you understand yourself better.

There's a corresponding "Money Harmony" book by Olivia Mellan that can offer more information.

Another book I suggest is "The Soul of Money" by Lynne Twist. This book is about investigating these cultural thoughts about money. It turns traditional views about money upside down and invites readers to start to question their relationship with money.

Chapter 5: Bringing it All Together

Once, I worked with a very rich executive who had retired. He had purchased a big, beautiful boat. But it wasn't making him happy.

Knowing that he'd recently had a big life shift when he retired, I took a guess and asked him if he had bought that boat for respect.

It was a big aha moment for him — he realized and admitted that he had bought that boat for respect.

For 30 years, he'd been an executive who'd commanded respect on a daily basis. He was contributing to his company. When he retired, he was left rudderless (no pun intended) and his needs for respect, contribution, and community were not being met.

In buying the boat, he was unconsciously hoping to get these needs met. He was hoping he'd be the toast of the yacht club. But nobody batted an eye. So the boat disappointed him. He wanted to sell the stupid thing.

Was it wrong to buy the boat? Yes and no.

It was not wrong to attempt to get his needs met. However, the expectation that this external object would get those needs met was clearly not the way to do it.

If he'd been able to recognize those unmet needs for what they were, he might have pursued other ways of having them met.

If he had been able to see that he was missing the respect he'd gotten day after day in his successful business, he might have pursued mentorship, starting another small business, or volunteering.

They might have been a lot more rewarding and a lot cheaper than buying a boat!

But the fact that he bought the boat doesn't make him a selfish jerk. It made him human.

Buying that boat was costly. Not just in terms of money but because he was miserable for two more years trying to figure out why it wasn't making him happy.

His needs were actually quite simple. Buying the boat just complicated things.

I hope that you can see that this story really isn't about the boat at all ... It's about the strange and sometimes costly ways we try to go about getting our needs met.

Unmet Needs in Trading

You may not have purchased a boat as in the example just discussed. But the general concept of unmet needs translates to smaller situations in trading, too.

What are some of the potential needs that trading satisfies?

Many people would say that it's all about money. But when you really consider it, it's possible that trading is meeting — or attempting to meet — a lot of other needs.

What needs does it satisfy for you, or might you want it to satisfy?

Maybe it's a sense of community.

Maybe you like the camaraderie — you want to be part of the inner circle.

Maybe it's a need to prove that you're smart.

Maybe you want to satisfy a desire for adventure or excitement.

Whatever they may be, these needs are not bad. But recognizing the needs you're trying to fill can help you figure out whether or not you're actually acting in your best interest.

Gaining self-awareness about the needs trading is filling for you can help you understand when you're in a trade for the wrong reasons. It can help indicate when you're doing the equivalent of buying a boat you don't need. It can keep you from making costly mistakes.

If you suspect that you are using trading to meet your needs, be honest with yourself ... Is this a healthy way to fill that need?

For instance, say that trading is fulfilling your need for challenge. Say you've been married for 20 years ... You have security, but you might not have a lot of adventure or challenge.

In that case, trading might actually be a healthy way to meet that need ... Being aware of that, you may want to keep your positions small so it is not too costly a method of meeting your needs.

But if you're taking massive positions that are the equivalent of ziplining from the world's highest building, trading may not be meeting your needs in a healthy way.

Filling the Void

Once, I spoke with a trader who recognized that he was attempting to use trading as a means to fulfill unmet childhood needs — a need to prove himself to his father, to overcome middle child syndrome.

But no matter what he did, it was never enough.

He thought he'd be happy once he made $100K.
But when he did, he felt like he needed to make $500K.
Then, he felt like buying fancy watches would make his life complete.
It went on and on...

He kept thinking these things would bring him status and that they would make him feel good. He thought they would make other people look at him and think he had "arrived."

But that end-goal kept eluding him. The harder he worked, the less satisfied he was. He couldn't genuinely feel happy for anyone else. It was eating him alive.

He felt that he should be happy — but he wasn't.

Recognizing his childhood needs was one thing ... But what that trader didn't recognize is that every one of his actions was motivated by a fear of not being good enough. Until he addressed that fear, no amount of money would fill that void.

This is a very tricky hurdle to overcome. We are programmed to think that our worthiness is dependent on us earning it. We get the message everywhere we turn.

It's a massive mind game, and it's been passed down from generation to generation. It's so hard to get past this way of thinking.

Untangling the Misinformation

One of my biggest teachers, Marshall Rosenberg, a pioneer of “non-violent communication,” says that the most dangerous word in the English language is “deserve.”

Why? Because it implies that some deserve and some do not.

That way of thinking tells us that some are worthy and some are not.

Anyone who is operating from that place of thinking is at a disadvantage. If you think that you're not enough and never will be until you achieve or attain XYZ, it's a fool's errand. That ladder only leads to another ladder. Then another one.

With this mindset, people who have been able to create financial well-being are painted into a corner. They thought once they checked this off they'd know they're worthy.

Worthiness doesn't come from the outside. It only comes from within.

Redefining Success

To move forward from a place of curiosity and imbued with a sense of self-worth, let's close by revisiting the definition of success that you created earlier.

Look back at your definition of success. Now, get curious about it.

Think back to the man who was trying to fulfill a need for respect. He didn't recognize that need, but he tried to fill the void by buying a boat.

Also consider the example of the man who kept wanting to make more, buy more, achieve more. He thought these things would make him successful, but he was miserable.

What they might have defined as “success” wasn’t actually making them happy.

You will not be happy if your needs are not being met.

When your needs are met, on the other hand, you feel positive sensations: joy, optimistic, amazed, equanimity, confident, hopeful, trust, relieved, proud, energetic, touched.

It’s a lot more pleasant than when your needs are not being met.

So if you feel unhappy and like nothing is ever enough, it may be time to reconsider your definition of success.

How do you want to redefine success moving forward?

Go Forth and Trade Confidently...

When it comes to trading, fear of failure and greed are typically not what they seem.

They’re usually not signs of personal failings or that you’re a terrible trader.

It’s possible that they represent something else entirely: your unmet needs.

Your inner gremlins love to perpetuate the idea that you’re flawed in some way. This can create negative self-talk and self-destructive cycles.

Fight that inner gremlin by getting curious.

What is behind the stories you tell yourself? What is driving them?

We so rarely write them down, consider what they mean, or give ourselves tenderness for having needs.

Yet the key to resolving your struggle with fear of failure and greed may in fact be identifying and then working to get your needs met.

If we get our wants met without our needs met, it's like eating a Twinkie. You'll be hungry a few minutes later!

So go ahead...

Start by identifying the needs that are not being met. Cross-reference it with your definition of success. Be honest with yourself. Consider how trading is part of getting these needs met. In what ways is it healthy and not too costly? In what other ways could it be costing more than it is worth?

This isn't a one-and-done sort of deal. You'll likely need to revisit this line of self-inquiry over and over in your trading.

It requires humbling yourself. It requires a lot of continued hard work. It can even get emotional.

But by doing this work, you can begin to create a subtle shift inside of yourself. Over time, it can have a profound effect on both your trading and your life.

Did you enjoy this ebook? If so consider the rest of Kim Ann Curtin's ebook series:

Book 1: Ego and Inner Gremlins: How Your Emotions Impact Your Trading

Are you being driven by ego and inner gremlins without even realizing it? For many traders, these monsters of self-sabotage can cause poor decision-making and impulse control. In this book, traders will gain a better understanding of what drives these inner critics so that they can begin to free themselves of destructive inner chatter that may be holding them back.

Book 3: Navigating FOMO and Comfort With Loss

How often do you trade because you're afraid of missing out? Many traders are driven by FOMO and unsure of how to get comfortable with loss. In this book, traders will get a better understanding of what's behind the FOMO in their lives and trading. In doing so, they can begin to make changes that can improve their outlook, decision-making, and increase their self-mastery.

Book 4: Discipline and Finding Your Edge

Struggles with discipline and a lack of proven edge are struggles that both new traders and seasoned traders with decades-long careers face. In this book, traders will get insight into why these common struggles persist for so long and learn powerful tools for identifying and working with their own tendencies to gain greater control in their trading and lives.

TheWallStreetCoach.com

(646) 420-2099

info@thewallstreetcoach.com